

Sexuality, Autism, and Young People- Families study (SAY-Families)

About the study

The SAY-Families team is researchers at Bangor University, the University of Warwick and the University of Glasgow. We are carrying out the SAY-Families study to find out parents' views and experiences around their child's sexual understanding and interest. The developing sexuality of young people with autism has not been given a great deal of research attention, yet it is a part of growing up for all young people. It is hoped that the information gathered in this study will help us design materials to support young people and their families.

What will taking part involve?

You are invited to fill in an online survey. You can find out more about the survey and access it using this link: https://bangor.onlinesurveys.ac.uk/say_fam_eng

Who can take part?

You are invited to fill in the survey if you are the parent of a young person with autism or Aspergers syndrome (who does not also have a learning disability), aged between 16 and 30 years old.

Many thanks for taking the time to read about the SAY-Families study

If you would like find out more about this research please contact Karen, either by phone: 07710762141 or by email: k.a.deakin@bangor.ac.uk